Nanoscale metal-carbon interface in a disordered Li-doped carbon: wet etch technique versus atom probe tomography. A chemical wet etching technique is employed for the first time to image the nanoscale interface between a localized cluster and the carbon matrix in a disordered carbon:Li system. In this technique, LiC<sub>6</sub> (2 wt% in carbon) is wet etched with carbonated water in an autoclave under microwave heating. The nanoscopic interface between the cluster and the carbon matrix is then investigated by cross-sectional scanning electron microscopy (SEM) and electron backscattered diffraction (EBSD) combined with atom probe tomography (APT) to map the chemical composition and structure of the interface. The results show that LiC<sub>6</sub> has a typical cluster structure and the cluster size distribution is 200-350 nm with a mean cluster size of about 200
