It includes features like annotations,.Q: Am I interrupting bank pulls? My bank has an app for withdrawing money that runs in the background. However, if you go into the settings and disable the app, it does not stop running and you'll lose your money until you re-enable the app. When you need to withdraw money from your account, an unlock code will be delivered to your mobile device in the form of an app and a text message. Your mobile device needs to be connected to the internet for the unlock code to be delivered. In the settings, it says "Banks: Improve the balance checking experience." I'm not sure if this is true if you have the app on, but when I run the app, the balances "update" automatically. Can I assume that the app is running while I'm doing other stuff? And if so, does the app actually pull/update the balances every minute, or only when I have the app on (and the app in the foreground)? A: The automatic background updates are done in a short period of time when the app is not in foreground. What you don't like about the app you have installed is that it will drain your bank account if you don't re-enable it. That's a really bad design. When you enable the app and check the balance you get some sort of message that your account is a little more than your usual balance. As you mentioned the app is doing it automatically. It might be due to a bug or an update that the app is not working properly but if you have an iOS > 7 and you don't enable it for a day or more the app will disconnect and stop updating balances. You should call your bank and ask if they fixed the bug or not. It can be quite a complex thing to do from Apple side and the iDevices can be complex devices.
