Spiking neurons with autoregulatory mechanisms based on short-term potentiation (STP) or homeostasis mechanisms are commonly used to model neuronal information processing. In this work we use two paradigmatic neuronal bursting models with STP and homeostasis mechanisms, the Morris-Lecar (ML) and the Winfree models, respectively, to study the effects of different types of heterogeneous autoregulation, so that the amplitude of the Nernstian potential decreases as a power law with the input current or as a linear function of the input current. In fact, the National Science Foundation reported that in the 1996-1997 academic year, only 18.9% of environmental sciences and engineering graduates were employed in the profession. The National Science Foundation proposed that environmental scientists need greater access to post-graduate education and training programs, to enhance their employability. As a result of recent budget reductions in higher education, environmental and related science courses are often offered in existing MS or Ph.D.-granting institutions, sometimes limiting postgraduate opportunities for students outside of the "Mainstream" (MS or PhD-granting) institutions.
