In drilling wells for oil and gas, a casing string is usually installed in the borehole during the drilling phase of the well, such as during the drilling stage of the well. The casing string will be set downhole and cemented into place as the wellbore is drilled. The wellbore is drilled using a drill bit attached to the lower end of a drillstring, which is suspended and rotated from a rig at the surface. The drilling operation proceeds by rotating the drillstring at the surface to cause the drill bit attached to the lower end of the drillstring to rotate. Such drilling operations will oftentimes include cementing using borehole fluids, such as oil, gas or water, in conjunction with high cost cement and high-cost additives used to facilitate cement systems. Drilling fluids are used during both directional drilling and drilling and are not only used to build up the well to facilitate the drilling, but to also maintain wellbore pressures to keep the well safely shut-in and in place. As the well nears the end of its useful life for a particular formation, then the borehole fluids and/or cased wellbores are selectively abandoned or flushed out by surface pumping and/or pumping downhole tools. However, before there is a chance to abandon the well, the well is usually has to be re-opened and new wellbore fluid is taken in. This is done to facilitate any subsequent remedial work. Downhole circulating tools are examples of such tools. One such circulating tool comprises a power pack, which powers tools at the bottom of the drillstring, including a mud motor. The mud motor is typically in line with the drillstring and will use the circulating fluid to rotate the drillstring and any attached tools. Although the circulating fluid will be pumped down from the surface through the casing and along the outside of the drillstring and actuate the motor and rotate the drillstring, there is a need for the motor
