HyperMotion Technology delivers a completely new way to experience FIFA's distinctive player controls. FIFA's ball physics engine will be fully re-developed, ensuring that every player is more responsive and reacts realistically to the ball. Player control has been entirely re-written from the ground up, with every element of the ball physics system rebuilt from scratch. During the game, players can make tackles in all directions, such as backward, sideways, forward, inside, outside and even backwards. Players can make tackles from the ground, while in mid-air or when they're off the ground with an opponent. Players can also catch or deflect the ball, or play it back to a teammate. The controls also allow you to make individual "effort" and "power" gestures. These allow you to control and manipulate the ball, while also changing your player's movement speed and acceleration. In this mode, when you make a shot, it's completely different to using a normal shot. You can't predict where the shot will go after a successful shot, and it'll go in a completely different direction to where you started your shot. You can also use the "B" trigger to perform a dribble. While dribbling, you can continue changing direction freely. You can also “sprint” towards an opponent as long as the “B” button is held down. A “Super Chase” mode will allow you to pursue an opponent and try to knock the ball into your opponent’s own goal. The pursuit distance will depend on the opponent’s current speed. The FIFA series has long been known for its simple, easy to use control scheme, and with the brand new HyperMotion Technology, that simple, easy-to-use control scheme returns.

Access Management Today’s cyber threats don’t just originate from a country that could launch a Stuxnet-style virus; they often originate from within an organization. In fact, most targets aren’t even aware of the threat until a data breach occurs. The most effective protection against these threats and the attack vectors they require access to is a very robust access management solution that centrally tracks, controls, and audits all access to critical systems and applications.
