It will be interesting to see how the engine handles this innovation and how development teams throughout the football ecosystem (from club, to manager, to FIFA World Cup) will be adopting it. I suspect it will be a key part in helping us create truly immersive football experiences, and achieve the next level in performance and physics. The FIFA 22 engine also introduces an innovative 3D drawing system. This is used to create unique animations, instead of having to use every animation available. Create your own animations It is important to understand, that in the 22 simulation, animations are not used to move you, but are used to create unique game pieces. In FIFA 22, you can create unique animations using this 3D drawing system, using motion capture data collected from real players during a match. I expect to see this used to create cutscenes, stadium set-pieces and commentary inserts, as well as animations used in situations such as tackling, headers, free-kicks, sprints and dives. It will also be used in the new sprint animation, next to the player as he runs away from the ball to create a moment that can be unique to a player, instead of being forced to use the available animations. Better responsive game design Last year we introduced the Star Player Design, which fully embraced the ability to change all players in a game at any time. This introduced a time-consuming, well-orchestrated and distracting process that affected the player's animation and appearance. In FIFA 22, we have added several improvements that will improve the responsiveness of the Star Player Design process: Visual clusters of players and substitutes are now shown when a Design changes A number of parts of the player can now be instantly replaced, using the new Select In Panel Players can be swapped at any time, once they are in-game Stars, players and Design Kits can be deselected or added instantly Artists now have one minute to change visual information during the Design process, using the panel to preview, confirm and apply the changes We have also improved the responsiveness of the game during the Design process. For example, if a player is replaced or altered on-the-fly, the game should no longer auto-activate a new Design when the player enters the game. Improvements in animation and player design The FIFA 22 engine introduces a new game engine, and a new animation system that will improve
