Integrate anatomy physiology lab manual answer. NASA has sent a robot into the southern reaches of the Red Planet to study the Martian groundwater. Scientists at NASA's Jet Propulsion Laboratory in Pasadena, California, developed the robot, dubbed DRTek-3, to understand how the surface of Mars works. When the robot landed on the surface, it created a video that showcases the Red Planet in all its desolate glory. The 1-millimeter-wide DRTek-3 explored the Martian surface for a few months, covering a total area of more than 19 square kilometers. The robot is equipped with cameras, a 3-D scanner, a seismometer, a miniature weather station and an ultraviolet imager, which provides information on how ultraviolet radiation interacts with the atmosphere. hemisphere. And when the software for the rover's mission is turned off, it can communicate with Earth via the Mars Odyssey satellite, which is circling around Mars. However, the robot will not be able to stay on Mars forever, as its lifespan will be determined by how much juice is stored in the rover's batteries. According to NASA, the batteries are expected to lose 5 percent of their charge every three months as the robot explores the planet. But the robot will be protected by heat-dispersing tiles and by a back-up set of batteries should the first set fail. "The Red Planet's climate and atmosphere are almost as hostile to life as they are for the people who fly these missions," said Dr. George Tandon, deputy project scientist for DRTek-3, in a press release. "We wanted to see if we could safely explore the Red Planet for a while." The image in this article has
