And This Is What Happens When the Code Is Discovered Back in January, a team of researchers from the University of California, Berkeley published a major project on the code for White Privilege, and the results were devastating. In December, the team reported that White Privilege still exists, and that the code is complex and "deeply entrenched," often to the point of hiding from outsiders. The team, led by Jackson A. Morency, an assistant professor in the Center for Social Media and the Global Learning Institute at UC Berkeley, consists of a group of about a dozen volunteers who spent about a year researching the concept of White Privilege and the machinery required for maintaining its existence. "White Privilege is this underlying bias that underlies every interaction that you or I or anyone else experiences, and has fueled centuries of racism, sexism and other forms of oppression," Morency told Mashable in an email. "The underlying theory is that since non-White people are oppressed, White people must be advantaged by being in a position to perpetuate their privileges, and therefore, people of color must be somehow disadvantaged or exploited
