Is there a possibility in the case that a user deletes all the cloud storage of the Notebook or its backup at the same time that it is doing the auto-backup? I can see that the notebook itself is protected by the cloud as much as possible. However, the image files which are stored in the cloud at the time of backup and in the cloud itself are hardly unique. If I delete them, then there's nothing to prevent someone from getting the image files. We don't do autobackup for Notebooks currently. So basically, the last backup you can do has all your information, which includes cloud storage (we use Evernote), as well as your email, etc. There's still a possibility of someone getting your cloud storage, but you would have to have that specific backup at hand (and it won't be easily done) and also share that specific link with us (via support ticket). Advertising - The Disadvantages Of Showrooming If you are shopping for the first time in a retail store, you are most likely excited to experience the many benefits a store visit can provide. However, once you actually step into the store, you will realize that there is more to a store visit than simply browsing. Instead, the sheer volume of people, the costs involved for product placement, and the lack of privacy can make store shopping feel quite different than shopping in many different retail outlets. While stores are typically quite busy at any given time, showrooming is a disturbing trend that will continue to spread its reach. Millions of people have showroomed in the past year, and it is only a matter of time before it becomes more than a trend. The traditional retail industry is generally used to carrying products that can be bought online. Generally, an online purchase provides the lowest purchase costs, and can be completed in record time without making any in-store visits. While the majority of consumers would be confused that showrooming exists, the number of people using showrooming as a shopping tactic really shows its success. An interesting aspect of showrooming is the fact that it is not solely a money saving option, but it is also an inevitable trend. Viewing a product on a screen while shopping is incredibly convenient, and generally much less painful than spending time looking at an item in person. In an age where it is now easier than ever to view online product info, showrooming is basically inevitable. However, one person's right to shop is another's right to buy. While there is no perfect solution to the problem, some of the ways that the retail industry has responded to the trend of showrooming are rather negative. Some retailers like Target have taken a variety of steps to prevent people from out of store shopping, such as providing iPad scanners to both customers and employees. This slow reaction to the showrooming trend has allowed it to be widely used, and has revealed just how incompatible the store shopping experience can be. The Internet is a powerful tool, and new technologies will continue to be added to the web as consumer preferences continue to shift. While it is impossible to assume that showrooming will be completely erased or forgotten, it does shine an undeniable spotlight on the various issues that are becoming increasingly strained. Shopping Through Social Media Most people would agree that the downsides of shopping through social media are surprisingly obvious. The major downside to twitter

Le'Dard Studio is a small indie development team based out of Prague, Czech Republic. We are currently developing The Last Taxi and would love to hear your thoughts on the game in our Steam Beta Survey. Imagine a simple city - full of trees and beautiful houses. But it's not just any tree nor house. This one, is different. Because the trees aren't just trees, nor are the houses just houses. The trees are nanobots. And the house is just the illusion of walls. The trees start talking to each other, explaining the nature of reality. People start getting ill, in a way, with hallucinations. The houses... forget their walls. They start going missing, people come out of the floor and climb the walls to be with the trees. There will come a day when those trees and houses won't be growing on this land anymore. Not because they killed all humans and turned them into drones. Not because there won't be any more human DNA or machines. When it all ends. The Trees: Don't drop your guard for a second. Don't fall asleep. Because the trees are listening to everything you do. Your mistakes. Your problems. Your fears. We're not gone yet. And we won't wait for that day. The Trees: The trees are talking. The trees are listening. The trees will judge. The trees will decide who is right. Don't worry. You're just an ant. A nanobot. The Trees: "Okay." It started with a question. How do we talk with those outside our walls? How do we tell them how it is? How do we tell them we're not afraid of them? How do we talk with those who don't understand us? But what if we found a way? What if we found a way to make them understand? What if we found a way to speak to those outside our walls? What if we found a way to let them speak to us? What if we found a way to make ourselves known to those outside? What if we found a way
