CDS.Multivariate analysis of clinical and imaging predictors of successful ablation for atrial tachycardia originating from the cavotricuspid isthmus. The purpose of this study was to analyze multivariate clinical and imaging predictors of successful ablation for atrial tachycardia (AT) originating from the cavotricuspid isthmus (CTI). Electrophysiological mapping and radiofrequency catheter ablation were performed at the CTI in 52 patients with AT. The CTI was located within the isthmus between the superior vena cava and the tricuspid valve in 22 patients and within the right atrium in 30. Multiple clinical and imaging parameters were analyzed for their association with AT termination and for the identification of clinical or imaging predictors of successful ablation. Of the patients 45 (87%) had no structural heart disease and 7 (13%) had structural heart disease. The procedural endpoint was AT termination in 44 (85%) of the patients; successful ablation was achieved in 38 (73%).

Logistic regression analysis showed that female gender, highly delayed activation at the CTI with conduction of the early activation to the retrograde atrial activation, and a long isthmus between the CTI and the right ventricle (RV) were associated with a higher probability of successful ablation. In addition, echocardiographic parameters that evaluate AT perpetuation, such as maximal wall thickness at the CTI, and the

localization of the CTI relative to the tricuspid valve were also
