and transport of 3H-vitamin D3-labeled amorphous CaCO₃ in the avian cecum. The fate of ³H-vitamin D₃-labeled amorphous calcium carbonate (CaCO₃) is studied in the cecum of the adult pheasant. The label is actively introduced by injections of ³H-vitamin D₃ and ³²P-vitamin A in the same solution. A considerable portion of this label is left in the intestinal lumen and only one fifth is excreted in the first 8 h. About one sixth of this radioactivity is adherent to the intestinal wall, and most of this radioactivity has become incorporated into the CaCO₃, indicating that the CaCO₃ microparticles are the major sites for phosphate storage in the small intestine. Virtually all of the radioactivity that is present in the intestinal lumen at the time of the vitamin D₃ injection becomes associated with the portion of CaCO₃ that makes up the deposit. This result indicates that the bulk of the divalent cations (Ca²⁺) and phosphate that enter the c
