Let's say I have a function: //This is just an example. You probably have more logic function myFunc(){ let text = 'Daft Punk' } This function is inside of another function: //Defining the whole function function otherFunc(){ let text = 'Empiricus' myFunc() } Now, in this case, what's the use of this inside the myFunc? since it's in the same function. Another example: //Defining the whole function function otherFunc(){ let text = 'Empiricus' this.myFunc() } Does it mean that I have to use it this way or am I doing something wrong? I've looked through many tutorials, but I can't seem to find any explanation of this question. A: Accessing this inside the context of a function generally means, that the function is a method of a constructor. If you want to use this with a function declared outside the context of a constructor, you should define a variable to store it. //Defining the whole function function otherFunc(){ let text = 'Empiricus' let self = this self.myFunc() } function myFunc(){ let text = 'Daft Punk' } otherFunc() A: Your first example: function otherFunc() { let text = 'Empiricus'; myFunc(); } isn't really doing anything. It's just creating a variable, assigning a value to it, and then immediately discarding it. There's no point in that, unless the code is trying to work around some weird API; I wouldn't expect to run into that situation, but it could be. Your second example would mean you have a separate scope with both the myFunc() call and the text assignment
