But the landmark fell with minimal fanfare, as the 22-acre site was mostly vacant after the Boalt apartment building was knocked down in 1971, and the site was part of a larger exurban sprawl that slowly filled in with small lots. The 1906 building — whose construction was funded by oil money — was considered an achievement of the city's burgeoning Industrial Age, the first building in San Francisco that had its own water supply, elevator, heating and air-conditioning systems, and indoor plumbing. Local historians say that while the structure was small and relatively plain, it was the height of its era, with art-deco style elements in common with San Francisco's other well-known architecture landmarks, including the Ferry Building and San Francisco City Hall. “It was the tallest building in the area,” said Ernest A. Meyer, a neighbor of the Stock Exchange when it was built. “ c6a93da74d
