Almost every camera manufacturer has a line of wireless transmitters and receivers designed to be used with their system. Most of these units are decent value for money, are capable of sending a signal of a few hundred watts for miles, and are basically replaceable transmitters and receivers. They also tend to have a few downsides. Some transmitters need to be plugged into mains electricity to work, others are unable to transmit video over longer distances, and some of them have restricted features and don't always work with digital cameras. Some of the wireless transmitters on the market, however, are made by companies such as Pelco, Pingtel, and Fujikos. These transmitters are all-in-one units that replace the camera's standard cable and can be purchased for around $100-150. While they are much more expensive than the transmitters made for most other manufacturers, they are more future-proof and well-designed than their more basic counterparts. In this article, we're going to take a look at our favorite of these wireless transmitters: the Pelco iSnap-L. It can be used as an standalone wireless transmitter, so you can send an image of the scene through the cable to a monitor/recorder and play it back for review. But it also has a detachable receiver that can be attached to a computer or other device to send images of the scene over the network. The Pelco iSnap-L can also capture images from a smartphone, tablet, or desktop computer using the Apple iOS and Android Bluetooth LE protocol. However, this wireless solution is not ideal for devices that don't have Bluetooth LE compatibility, or those that have no wireless capabilities. In addition, the iSnap-L is a bit bulky and has a limited battery life. 5ec8ef588b
