The “Save” dialog box is sometimes a little tricky to use. It’s possible to accidentally open a new file instead of saving changes you made. For example, when you’re cropping an image you can select any of the “Crop” options and, before saving, just hit Enter. You may end up with a blank file, if you did that accidentally. Additionally, when you click on the “Save” button, you don’t get all the changes that have occurred in your image. You may end up with a file that has some changes, some that haven’t been applied and some that have been applying for some time. Another full screen adjustment tool is coming to Photoshop, which will allow you to take images that have a gradient in them and to adjust the transparency of the areas the gradient fills. Looks like you'll need to experiment a little with the tool to determine whether it meets your needs. Also, the biggest news of all is that the new edition of Photoshop is getting multi-recording support for video conferencing. This is something that users have been asking for for a while now. The feature is being introduced in the Windows version of Photoshop to begin with. Adobe has frozen the Windows version of Photoshop CC for 2021, but the macOS version will allow for all of the key features. Interestingly, Adobe has announced that you will no longer receive a free upgrade to the next version of Photoshop for Windows. This move could also apply to the macOS version, although it is not clear as yet. Adobe has also put together a useful free Photoshop Elements 2019 guide for 2020 on its website that explains some of the features in greater detail. Nothing is official yet but there's every sign that Photoshop for Windows and macOS is getting even more of an emphasis from Adobe.
