Since the workup of chicken nucleic acid with restriction endonucleases, this laboratory has been actively involved in elucidating the mechanism of specificity for DNA sequence recognition by enzymes of this type. The approach used to characterize DNA enzymes is that of chemical modification of specific sites followed by evaluation of the effect of modification on enzymatic activity. We have succeeded in characterizing and distinguishing two fundamentally different classes of DNA recognition sequences, which we call the "tight" and "loose" sites. In the past year we have demonstrated that the effect of  $Mg^{2+}$  on DNA enzymes is determined by the nature of the DNA recognition sequence. We have also demonstrated that the kinetics of the cleavage reaction are dependent upon the nature of the recognition sequence and thus independent of the mode of enzyme binding. These findings are consistent with a model in which the pre-steady-state phase of the reaction reflects the binding of two enzymes to the DNA, while the steady-state phase of the reaction reflects the combined activity of the enzymes on the DNA.

By Chris Wright Please, please, please, can we have a repeat of last night's conference title game between the Carolina Panthers and the New Orleans Saints? We have no desire to see the Super Bowl rematch between the Packers and the Falcons - even if the 2-8 Vikings were left in the proverbial dog-house. And yet there's a chance that we're in for another classic match-up. Sure, the Saints are a 2-8 team that managed to lose more games than they won in 2014 (one more) and in 2015 (two more), but all the same they're hanging in there. They just managed to beat one of the big guns of the NFC South, the Panthers, by a score of 23-17 in South Carolina. The Saints gave the Panthers all they could handle in the first half, before the Panthers took charge in the second, which ended up being the difference. Needless to say, the Panthers are going to be contenders again this year, but their turnaround from being 5-11 to being 6-4 in such a short space of time is, well, interesting. According to NFL executive vice president of football operations Troy Vincent, the Panthers are also going
