This feature is only available to those having the Pro upgrade. It works like this: when you open and save an image, Lightroom now recognizes this as a new raw file and saves that raw file along with other RAW files within the same photoshop session. It then opens the newly created RAW file (allowing you to customize), along with other RAW files within the same Photoshop session, and 'recommends' adjustments, if any, based upon other files. It has worked with every RAW file I have explored so far. The latest 5.2 update has just hit the shelves, and unfortunately, it misses so many great features. The biggest hiccup is the complete absence of the 'Predictive Custom Range' system that has worked flawlessly in 5.1.5. The new introduction of bulk adjustment presets as well as perfect exposure are great features, but MR only has 2 preset slots before it tries to default to the old and nasty Exposure. This is something that used to be a 5 minute fix in LR 4. So, I'm pretty sure that I will be hanging around Lightroom 5 – probably 5.1.5 – for as long as it takes to work through these clunkers. So, I'm very curious to see what they will pull from the old code. The imaging world has seen hundreds of new features and features change over the course of the last few years. Not all of them are useful and some are actually worth their time, expense and power usage. That's why it's important to do your research and determine which features are truly helpful. Most active professional photographers can probably imagine a performance flaw in their camera. It's possible to access this information on a piece of paper in Photoshop, but you will have to live with it until the time comes to go to the lab to exchange it. In the viewfinder, the live preview is the only option, although it will typically not show potential problems.
