This article is more than 4 years old This article is more than 4 years old The Canadian military is defending an air force proposal for drones to patrol the Arctic after one of the world's most respected glaciologists described the plan as an assault on the spirit of the region. The Canadian Press reported on Friday that the defence department is in advanced talks with the US military to have small unmanned aircraft provide military surveillance over the northern waters. Global warming: 'Rising oceans, melting ice caps' spell disaster for planet | The second of four Guardian series Read more The department and the Department of National Defence will have a budget for the potential Arctic drones at $34m (€26.4m) and are negotiating with the US defence department to do the work jointly. David Barber, a glaciologist at the University of Alberta, told the Canadian Press: "It's not in any way about solving the problem in the Arctic ... It's about ... turning the Arctic into a kill zone. "I look at it through the lens of a place to live. It's a place for human beings. It's an opportunity to see things, to see our future," Barber said. Barber was so disturbed by the Canadian military proposal that he wrote a letter to Canada's national science panel. The panel's first meeting of the new year began on Monday and will consider 40 recommendations to improve the way Canada conducts research and evaluates scientific evidence. These recommendations will inform the government's proposed 2015 budget, which will be presented in March, and ultimately any decision to buy military drones for the Arctic. Barber and the Canadian Association of Professional Geologists will present their proposals later this month. In the letter to the national science panel, Barber called for a moratorium on the purchase of unmanned aerial vehicles until the panel has completed its own report. He said: "The panel should have the ability to review the drones, determine whether they are appropriate for the Arctic, and then determine their impact on the environment. "I believe that it is incumbent on the panel to make a decision on unmanned aerial vehicles at this time." Barber
