Hardware Wallets I think the average person in the cryptocurrency community is familiar with hardware wallets, there are three that stand out for being able to store your cryptocurrency securely. Trezor is the most popular for the clear and simple interface and low entry price of $79. Ledger is more expensive, however has a growing community and it's also a great hardware wallet. KeepKey is the newest for a higher entry price of $220 and has its own community, which should grow as people learn about the Ledger and Trezor. Trezor, the most popular hardware wallet, is the only one we've seen, so far, that has crypto analytics embedded on the device. It is one of the few out there that can interface with an Android phone on the Trezor app and the Infinito Wallet for iOS. It doesn't make sense to put analytics on a server that is also holding your cryptocurrency, so Trezor is one of the first out of all of the wallets we've seen and we love the security they are providing. Trezor is not the cheapest, but for those who want the most security we feel it is worth every penny. They have
