Creating a perfect shot of a sunset isn't something you should be doing all the time. It's exciting to watch the sun set, but you can't possibly remember all the details of the sequence of events that took place. You'd end up falling asleep and missing the best part of the spectacular sunset! For these reasons, setting up powerful presets in your photo software is a great way to start with environmental editing, known as "artistic retouching" in the industry. When you edit photos in GIMP and most editors, you have to work with RAW images.RAW has just one file extension:.DNG. You can open GIMP and other programs with this extension with no problems. RAWs image is JPG or something. You can import from RAW and edit the image, but there are some time consuming problems. The conversion process of RAW to JPG is too slow and sometimes the results are not so beautiful. To solve these problems, open a RAW image as a JPEG image (some editors can this in one click), then you can edit JPG more easily, quickly and accurately. When you close GIMP or Photoshop, the images should be saved as transparent PNGs, but often they are messing with some GIF files with no problem and no solid color is saved. Transparent method saves the image in EXIF data of SolidColorImage tag with color transparent. You can get this tag value in your photo software when you rename the PNG to.GIF. There are many retouching things in GIMP and Photoshop. These are more powerful and flexible. Of course,, you can explore. If you made a mistake, you can correct only small details on the selected area, like removing speckling, correcting color, or scaling an object. Sometimes you want every detail on an image to look perfect! You can correct the tilt of the object, removing a white spot or correcting the blur on the objects' surface. You can erase the memory of your friend from the photo or restore the photo completely or use a special effect. GIMP doesn't have all these functions, but Photoshop does, and it is very powerful.
